China & Cybersecurity

Nelson Dong

As more companies and government agencies go online, cybersecurity is an increasing concern. Cyber-attacks coming from China in particular have been rising, with most cases targeting U.S. intellectual property and state secrets. Though the Chinese government claims there are efforts to control the online crime, President Obama has approached Chinese president Xi Jinping with hopes to protect U.S. information and data.

Nelson Dong is a partner in the Seattle office of international law firm Dorsey & Whitney LLP. He is head of the firm's National Security Practice Group and co-chair of its Asian Practice Group. In 2011, Dong was named Washington state's Super Lawyer in the field of international law. Dong has experience representing technology companies and research institutions, and his expertise covers many areas, including national security laws, domestic and international technology transfers and licensing, intellectual property law, technology-related business transactions between the U.S. and Europe and Asia, and the financing and organization of high technology business.
